

The Sacramento Observer, a weekly newspaper that has served Sacramento's Black citizens with distinction for almost 60 years, is looking for talented interns.

This is an excellent opportunity for aspiring journalists to grow under the visionary leadership of Publisher and CEO Larry Lee, who is bringing The Observer into the 21st century with a strong emphasis on multi-media, including video and podcasts along with strong stories for the weekly print edition.

Six times, The Observer has been awarded the John. B. Russwurm Trophy for Journalism Excellence - the Pulitzer Prize of Black Journalism - by the National Newspaper Publishers Association comprising more than 200 Black newspapers. Check out our ongoing series, "Sistahs on the Frontline," by senior writer Genoa Barrow.

Our journalism interns will work with veteran reporters and editors to produce a range of content, including Business profiles, news features, community stories, videos, and Podcasts for 10-12 weeks over the summer. We also may be hiring a full-time staff writer and health reporter. Interns who shine could get an opportunity to be promoted. We can accommodate up to three summer interns from Stanford.

Please send a letter of interest, resume, several work samples, and two references including all contact information to:

Stephen Magagnini, Knights class of 2002
Editor in Chief
The OBSERVER Media Group
stephen.magagnini@sacobserver.com
530-848-5188